A lad named Charles Platt, twelve years old, was standing carlessly on the machine in passing the fourth story and he was caught between the dummy and the crossbeam of the floor. When the men returned they found the bedy, cut in two at the hips, lying on the lower floor. Pateness of blood and flesh adhered to the beam above, showing that the lad fell down when cruzhed. His face was as natural and composed as though the were in a similar, but the sight of the mangled form below the waits was hortble. The legs were almost flattened out.
